

297-298 Ovid here again describes the love-affair in terms of a battle: the reader will be trying to conquer (superarit) the girl (i.e. make her fall in love with him and go to bed with him and keep things that way), and so the woman will be his enemy (Amazona: the Amazons were a race of fierce and barbaric female warriors); Ovid's advice (meo...ferro) will constitute a useful weapon in this struggle and help his pupils to victory; the victorious reader will win spoil (what one strips from the defeated enemy, i.e. the girl's clothes), and Ovid wants him to follow the common ancient practice of adding an inscription to the spoil (which will acknowledge the poet's help). superarit is a contracted form of superaverit (future perfect).

Ovid here continues with the idea of the affair as an epic encounter (the Greeks fought the Amazons in the Trojan War, and Achilles killed their leader Penthesileia), now describing his Ars as an offensive weapon as well (thereby representing it as even more useful and helpful) and working in two further jokes (the unflattering comparison of the girl to an Amazon and the idea of spoil) which enable him to conclude triumphantly with a reference to himself and his important contribution.
